OUR DEAD.

Grief cannot win them back; And yet with frequent tears We bring to mind their cherished forms, With thoughts of other years, With love that neither death nor change Hath power to sever or estrange.

We cannot blot them out From memory's written page; We cannot count them strangers, but As birds in prison cage. We beat against the iron bar That keeps from those friends afar.

Oblivion may not hang Its curtain o'r their grave, There is no water we can sip Like Lethe's lulling wave; But fond affection's moaning wail Breaks from us like the Autumn gale.

Ye are not dead to us: But as bright stars are seen We hold that ye are ever near; Though death invades between, Like a thin cloud that veils from sight The countless spangles of the night.

From the Cincinnati Enquirer. SONG OF THE INVALID.

How long the winter lasts, mother, I wish the spring would come, I want to see the flowers bloom Around our cottage home. I've tried to bear this pair, mother, To suffer and be strong

But all in vain I feel it now,

I cannot stay here long. I wish that I could live, mother, Till spring time's sunny hours, I wish that I might pass away Amid the wild wood flowers. For now the snow is on the ground, The cold winds wildly moan,

The very light looks sad to me That warms the hearth of home. I gaze out on the leafless trees, I watch their branches wave, I'd like to see them bloom before They lay me in the grave.

I long to see the meadows green, And buds begin to swell, I sometimes think the warm bright days Would cheer and make me well. But I'll not murmur now, mother, I know these thoughts are vain,

Or hill-tops green again. Yet I shall gaze on brighter scenes When they lay me down to rest, For I shall view unblinded then

I'll never see the waving corn
